Cerebral myelination during infancy and early childhood is thought to contribute to the plasticity of the adult brain, which may underlie the better cognitive outcome reported in later life among children who were nourished in a period of rapid postnatal growth. Myelination is a highly dynamic developmental process, and standard imaging techniques are limited by poor sensitivity. The specific aims of this work were to quantitatively review the myelination patterns in the developing brain using histological techniques and to review the literature reporting on myelin water fraction (MWF) as an indirect marker of myelination. A systematic search of the literature between 1997 and 2017 using PubMed/MEDLINE and Google Scholar was performed with combinations of the terms "myelin water fraction," "myelin," "myelination," "synaptic density," and "synaptogenesis." The literature search was limited to articles published in English and providing original data. Forty-three papers reporting data from a variety of brain regions were included in this review. Significant regional differences were found across brain regions in myelination rates throughout infancy and early childhood. Myelination began in specific regions of the brain during the first year after birth. Myelination paralleled both synaptic density and synaptic growth. MWF may be a useful tool to quantify developmental myelination in vivo and may provide the opportunity to quantify and modify the effects of
