The default setting for a new Archive in Windows 2008 R2 is to compress a folder. It will look at each file with a.zip extension in the folder and compress it (this can take a long time). You can change this to "Uncompress a folder" or "Compress a folder" in the settings window. No additional tools are needed and you don't need to think about how to compress individual files (often used with 7-zip for example). You can use the new default setting to archive all files in a folder or you can use the optional setting to select a folder and then archive only the files in the folder. This enables your new Archive to be used for your deployment packs, archives, respository and sources. You can then archive your source code by using a wizard or drag and drop files to it (a small icon will appear in the explorer toolbar). Archives can be opened in windows Explorer by double clicking on them, or opened in explorer directly by opening the remote folder location in Windows Explorer. They can be accessed locally from the "Resources" tab or mapped drives from the "Paths" tab. Multiple archives are accessed from the "Files" tab, you can also select a folder to archive and navigate to another archive folder. Archives can be copied, edited, moved and renamed. You can create, share and delete archives. You can share them in several ways. You can select to "Export", "Print" or "Delete" on the "Files" tab. You can use the "Files" tab to create a Zip file of an archive and be able to open it in Explorer. This can be used for rapid deployment (or just to archive) and can be copied to remote locations. The settings window is used to change archive behaviour and to set compression and mapping options. You can view which archives have been created since the program was last run. Features: Small 11kb application Allows you to archive folders (settings are set by default for that) Lists archives in the "Files" tab Allows copying, moving, renaming archives Has a small settings window Extract archives with a button (right click menu or double click) Compress archives with a button (right click menu or double click) You can use the "Delete" button to remove archive files You can use the "Copy" button to copy archive files
