What's New in the Halp For Microsoft Access?

This object adds a number of values to the Access help system, allowing the user to add index values, free-form help entries, and in-place help search. A developer can add an object to the help system by opening the object view. By adding values to this, the developer will be able to enable the user to access the object's subject without having to view the entire help topic. This object also acts as a model for the in-place help system and provides the user with the ability to easily search the help topic. This object makes use of the Microsoft Help Viewer. The Help Viewer reads the help topic stored in the help file and displays a pop-up menu in order to let the user access the Help Viewer. The developer can add the above object to the help file in order to access the Help Viewer. Moreover, it also adds a string to the help topic, thus allowing the user to store the index value. Developers can also edit in-place help systems without requiring a direct help topic. The editable portions of the help topic can be grouped into sections, and the developer can easily point to and edit those sections. Additionally, the developer can set a pop-up menu value to help the user select which tool or control he wishes to access. Furthermore, this object displays an alert after the user closes the help file. This is to encourage the user to update the help topic and save it for future reference. An example of use of the Microsoft Access help application: The following examples will show how the above components of Halp for Microsoft Access can be used to create an in-place help system: Create a new Access Project: -Open the Microsoft Access project -Right-click on the Project Explorer > New item > Next > Access help system: A new project file will be created. We will call it "help.accdb". Open the application view: -Open the database -Right-click on the application view > Open object > Details. Note: Access enables the user to view the object view without having to open the database view. Add the object by opening the Help -> Create: -Select "ToolTip" -Click "Next" -Select the object to add the index value of 1 for this "ToolTip" object -Click "Finish" You will be presented with
