What's new in The Adventure Of NAYU Soundtrack:

Interview I sat down at Hammerwatch's camera for an in-depth discussion about their title, his assault rifles, new hires and a variety of other subjects... The Senior Editor of Hammerwatch Blog and a Natural Selector (NSS), J DeMarco has covered the bad assoual rifles for many years. His twitter is @tinylubricants, and you can swing by his blog page at tinylubricants.com. I really haven't tried anything other than my M4 and the G36. I have the best relationship with USPSA as they use my 9mm Harpfield M4 (I don't consider it an assault rifle, though) and I'm replacing my Harpfield Suppressor with another M4. But after doing a set of ATAC 9mm training some problems came up with my M4 and I may convert it to a different firing system in the near future. I bought a PT22 dual pump gas system at an estate sale for $300 and I got it re-piped to fit a 9mm PFH so I can shoot it at USPSA even though I'm not a member there (I go to the Detroit qualifier) because it has very low print-and-shine recoil. It seemed stupid of me to not sell or trade the G36 since they don't even use it outside of the guards (it's mainly for training). I've also got a folding AR-15 for range practice although I'm more interested in something with a good aftermarket sights over an iron sight AR-15. Now they're just using some 7.62x39 military rifle form the 80's, 90's, and early 2000's which makes the rifles useless! Their 'real' functions are for competition shooting and searching houses (in the movies!). While the G3 is the best gun of the movies because it's as good as soldiers use in the field and it's accurate (and the 'cool factor'), it's just not realistic at all because the bullet weight makes it absolutely unusable in the field! But I can help them sell more to the bureaucrats since I frequent the training courses at $500 each. I'll just have to wait until they train the
