The Sumerians and others also began to use "no" as a negative response to a question, Nakatani said, and as a way of notifying others that they were not going to take something. "It was the earliest manifestation of the idea of 'no.'" Nakatani, who has authored many books and articles on the Japanese language, said that the concept of "no" was refined during the reign of Shun-A in the Eastern Han Dynasty. During this period, Japanese Buddhism flourished and, as a result, writings and stories about the Buddha spread, says Nakatani. "The Japanese began to respond with 'no' to negative people in their own lives," she says, noting that because Buddhism teaches us that our own
